." "You see, if Rick Carson asked us to abandon them, he had reason to believe that the value of the land would increase. Now, if the value of the land increases, there is a very good chance that the owner will want to be paid. So, he must have believed that the owner would want to be paid. "That means that he is admitting that he lied and he is guilty of being a thief." "Wow, that is very clever of you, Mr. Winthrop. Where did you learn that?" "I learned it from the teachings of the great Karl Marx." "Oh." Vincent Vancamp is a republican (for obvious reasons). On the other hand, he a very recent college graduate who has never had to worry about a living wage, universal health care, family leave, or safer streets, and who has never come close to knowing the unvarnished truth. Thus, his moral compass is always on tilt, so when someone comes along who can show him the truth, he is momentarily blinded by it. It's not that Vancamp doesn't think. It's that he is so ingrained in a world of lies that he can't quite believe in the truth of his own mind. (Published Friday, Nov. 21, 2018) "Now, Mr. Carson. I ask you. Did you get your money?" "Yes, Mr. Winthrop. I did." "And will you be happy about this?" "It is all taken care of." "And you are not going to do anything to stop him?" "I have no standing in this case." "Is there anybody else that you can tell the truth to?" "No." "And you will do your best to continue being the truth-teller that you are?" "Yes." "Do you understand that you will be banished?" "Yes." "If we are to believe that Mr. Carson paid you the

Every state in the United States has experienced an increase in the availability and use of prescription opioids. Between 2000 and 2010, deaths from prescription opioid overdose have more than quadrupled, from 4.5 per 100,000 to 19.3 per 100,000. In 2010, states reported that approximately 2.1 million people aged 12 and older had been prescribed opioid pain relievers. In addition, 80% of all prescribed opioids are used for long-term pain relief. Although most patients with chronic pain are able to cope with their condition, many experience severe pain. Among persons who experienced chronic pain in the last 12 months, 12% reported pain that was severe enough to interfere with most daily activities. Substance abuse is widespread in the US, not surprisingly due to the increased availability of prescription opioids. Some patients have been able to function normally and have been able to reduce or even eliminate the use of opioids. Unfortunately, many patients find that the side effects are greater than the value of the pain relief. Other patients fail to achieve adequate pain control, leading to an overall poor quality of life. The poor quality of life is largely due to the mechanism of the pharmacological action of opioids. Opioids act on the opioid receptors in the central nervous system (CNS). There are three types of opioid receptors (mu, delta, kappa) in the CNS. While the mu receptor is activated by all opioids (both therapeutic and non-therapeutic), the delta and kappa receptors are mainly activated by opioids with limited efficacy and abuse potential. These receptors can mediate a wide range of activities, including addiction, cognition, nociception, regulation of sleep/wake cycles, and reward. The therapeutic utility of opioids is closely related to the variability of their efficacy across opioid receptors and the efficiency of delivery of these agents to the target tissues. The variability of efficacy is related, in part, to the physiological blockade of opioid receptors by endogenous agonists. During chronic opioid treatment, this blockade leads to tolerance and a state of functional receptor down-regulation. The blockade of receptors by endogenous agonists creates a strong dependence on opioid therapy in patients. The tolerance is defined as the reduction in drug efficacy (i.e., the loss of analgesia) that can occur after prolonged exposure to opioids. Tolerance is different than the physical dependence that is due to withdrawal of agonists, which manifests as certain signs and symptoms of an opioid withdrawal syndrome (e.g., physical dependence, CNS excitation, seizures, etc.). The
