Family-style dining is one of the country's greatest gastronomic delights. But what happens when you're among a family of seven or eight? That's when the real dining magic starts to happen. At the Valdosta, Georgia, home of the Sons of Hermann, that means picking a side of the table for each family member to make sure they get the exact foods they want. It's a kind of battle royal that involves some serious elbow grease. Each son works together to set up the table—by his or her specialty. And guess what? They all work together too, with no one saying a critical word. The meals are communal, and everyone eats together. And the products they all eat are carefully chosen. In fact, each of the seven sons and his respective wife spend a year traveling to the California cities of Los Angeles, San Francisco, San Diego, and San Jose for three to six months each year to scour hundreds of various fresh ethnic foods from the world's different cultures. Their table is loaded with items from their ethnic heritage, including such things as tongue peppers, goat cheese from the Basques, calabrian olives from Italy, green olives from Turkey, french beans from France, pimento cheese from Jamaica, stuffed peppers from Puerto Rico, and chorizo from Mexico. They've become experts in sourcing and preparing the foods they eat, and even brought out food-mastery demonstrations at the Sons of Hermann contest in 2000. The answer, they claim, is to "eat like a food historian," which for this family simply means they eat according to tradition. What Tradition? In 1999, Michael Stucker, the founder of Sons of Hermann, was named "America's Fattest Chef," thanks to his nearly 400 pounds of meat. He's also been a judge at the National Barbecue Contest, a National Barbecue

Cooking Championship, The James Beard Award, and the World Barbecue Champion Award. The people at Sons of Hermann do not follow any formalized diet. They eat like their ancestors did, according to their tradition. It's a way of life, and a profound one. I'm amazed at the way they eat, in part because it's so different from anything I'd ever seen before.
