Ethan's Triangle The Red Land of Oz is drier than the Great Sandy Desert – but in November, the field around Hamel's pencil and barbecue smoke houses is filled with hay. The hay grows in that red earth by way of a process called natural seeding, a way of growing hay that's less intensive than conventional hay farming. The result is hay that's drier, easier to bale and store, and more nutritious. The price per ton of Hamel Hay is lower than other types of hay and, despite being harvested in autumn, it lasts throughout the winter. Hamel says natural seeding uses 50 per cent less fuel and creates about 20 per cent less CO2 than conventional hay farming. 'There's not really any downside to it.' But there are potential downsides in Australia, such as the differences in climate and the price of hay. A few days ago, the price of natural hay went into free fall, driven by growing demand and drought. That price is now back up again, and Hamel is already trying to move into other Australian states. 'One of the things we're trying to develop is a complete soil health initiative. Your soil doesn't respond like any other living thing on the planet, because it has all these organisms growing in it,' says Hamel. 'The main point is, it's going to take a while to get our soil right.' That
