In reality, the idea of a "Grey's Anatomy"-ish health care nonprofit that's completely free was so controversial that it had trouble finding investors. Still, in 2013, when Kaiser Permanente came up with the free care scheme, it was big news. "Politically, it was sort of perfect," said Eileen Norris, Kaiser's executive vice president for health plan operations. "They were starting a conversation and getting people to talk about it." Kaiser Permanente went public with the idea in 2014. Some American insurers, under financial pressure, have been trying to experiment with free care, too. Kaiser's overall free care plan is administered locally, and 45% of its 4.4 million members are offered the insurance. But the Kaiser Permanente medical group is still the largest nonprofit health care system in the country. Its headquarters in Oakland, Calif., offers a standard of care that's some of the nation's best. The free care scheme requires customers to apply for coverage. When they get approved, they get coverage for whatever their state makes free, and Kaiser Permanente pays all the costs not covered by their insurer. Around a third of its customers aren't on Kaiser Permanente, and many of them are from the Affordable Care Act exchanges. Kaiser Permanente relies on its reputation for care to sell the program. c6a93da74d
