Please help make this page better by.LONDON, Dec 4 (Thomson Reuters Foundation) - U.N. reform must take place in the next few years if the world is to be able to prevent more than 200 million landmines from being left in the ground, a report released on Thursday said. The U.N. Landmine Action Initiative report urged more government support for disarmament and demining of mined areas and better training and coordination of current mine action efforts. About 52 million anti-personnel mines are thought to be around the world. "We are losing years from lives lost or maimed from disease due to mines," said Robert Fowler, the study's lead author and director of the U.N. Landmine Action Programme. "But the great thing about mine action is we can recover from it. By breaking the silence around the issue, people come together in solidarity to clear mines." At least 40,000 deaths and maiming have been linked to mined areas. "We need to take up the challenge as the world's largest humanitarian crisis by endangering lives, health, livelihoods and the environment," Fowler said. "The time to act is now." The report's analysis of government and private sector data showed that more than half of the world's land mines have yet to be cleared. Last year's report, 'Hidden and Lost', said that more than 200 million land mines are lying around the world. "The world should have spent a large part of the last decade and a half building on the achievements of the last decade," said Fowler. "It needs to work harder and to do
