It's titled, Wait Till It's Dark: Black Leaders and the Rise of the New Black

Power. The publisher’s blurb on the book description reads as follows: The election of Barack Obama marked the rise of a new generation of black leaders, men and women like Alphonso Swift, the former chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, and former CIA official and Katrina cleanup worker James V. Hatch. Many of these extraordinary men and women of color will come together for an unprecedented summit to discuss the challenges they face and the forces that are shaping their futures. Terry Moran, senior national correspondent for NBC News, will be the first non-academic to capture their stories. This morning I was reading about Terry Moran’s new book at Daily Kos. An excerpt titled, Leading: The Race to Save the Leaders of America’s Black Colleges and Urban League written by the author appeared on Tom Foreman’s White House Watch. The book excerpt quotes President

Obama making a speech during his inaugural address for the first time about the “vast plane of history” as it related to the nation’s history of slavery. He added that the nation began its journey from slavery to the promised land of equal rights. Terry Moran at the “Glossy Book Cover”: Moran’s book is about the black leaders who struggle to create a more equal nation. It also explores 1cdb36666d
