Q: How to send only files from a FTP server to a client? I have a folder at a FTP server with several files. These files are sent to the client that in turn browses the folder through a URL. The problem is that also some files that are not meant for the client (such as binaries or other data files) are sent to the client: 1) So how can I send only the files I wish to make available to the client? A: You can use requests in your web browser as your ftp client. What this does is that you can change your ftp url to this. This will make the ftp client download the file without doing the directory listing that the browser normally does when you download a file. And the username and password will be dealt with by the ftp client. Cheers. Q: What does this line in the timing diagram mean? My question is in the title, I've recently built up my understanding of how finite state machines work, and I've built a very basic FSM in which I can have it pause and keep track of memory locations, and using the I/O pins
