A: I don't think that the question can be closed. There is no hardware question and it is not a "how to build a typewriter" question. The only reason I closed it, was because it was more of a "I would like to know if there is a way to do X" rather than "how to do X".

So please refrain from closing questions, especially when they have no opinion close reason. While your wish to have the question reopened may be correct, there is no point in doing that yourself. So have you already tried to contact one of the moderators? If not, do it now. This probably doesn't apply as the question was not closed "as if a phone of a zune v.3.5 is a computer", but you still might have a point. Think back. When Chris, an attractive broker, was with another firm, she wasn't only the top performer, she was the envy of the office. It was her time, and she wasn't wasting it. As she moved into her own place and went through her routines of organizing her desk and filing her invoices, she thought about the time she spent with each customer. She had the ideal hours: 9 a.m. to 7 p.m. for personal calls, and 8 a.m. to 6 p.m. for business calls. She had this perfect dayto-day routine that allowed her to be efficient, productive, and less stressed. She had the right system set up. She timed her activities to the minute and had it all under control. The one thing she didn't have, however, was a plan for people. Sometimes she wanted to take on a new home customer, but she never knew how to go about it. She didn't have a system for managing customers, and even though she tried, they always seemed to come back to her begging for another account. The Dirty Secret Here's the dirty little secret about Chris: she didn't have the skills to successfully manage new clients. Her sales skills were excellent, and she was a firm believer in sales management, but she didn't know how to measure the success of a relationship. So, she could lead people to success, but she was definitely lacking when it came to managing them. Once Chris sat down and really thought about her failures over 6d1f23a050
