Actually, the GNU linker doesn't delete unused libraries, it just ignores the unused items by removing them from its dynamic linker search list. That has two benefits: (1) does not require you to rebuild your binary after adding/removing a library and (2) does not affect the size of the resulting binary. In practice, this usually results in larger binaries in cases where you have multiple libraries (either due to multiple versions of the same library or due to one library containing multiple versions of itself). If this is an issue, you need to rebuild your binaries anyway because the linker has no way to tell which libraries are used in a binary. The only solution is to avoid this and manage library dependencies in source code rather than linking them dynamically.]]> Show HN: Simple Website Builder - cloudhead ====== prateekdayal I like the fact that it is open source (MIT). It would be great if you can share a brief explanation on how that "Build faster" claim is valid. Or what bottlenecks you had faced, or errors you had seen. ~~~ cloudhead No idea why you like the fact that it is open source (MIT). Anyone who understands the basics of web application development already knows that you need to build in isolation before deploying to the real world. Git is the simplest way to do that. All I can say is that I needed to do that, because let's face it, it isn't that hard to actually build a website. There are so many tutorials, free and paid, out there which make it easy for people to build single page sites. You don't need to understand how servers work or what tools are used to do that. ~~~ krapp >No idea why you like the fact that it is open source (MIT). Because you should be able to see how it was built, I presume. If it's open source, you can easily check that out. ~~~ andrewla Unless there are false commits, having a public history of all commits is a minus not a plus. ~~~ kra
