Google codeQ: MD5/RMD5 Chiptext in Python 3.4.1 I'm currently learning about cryptography and I've came across some questions about MD5 and RMD5. My questions are: When should I use MD5 in a cryptographic application. Where is MD5/RMD5 vulnerable? (I can think of a few instances) A: When should I use MD5 in a cryptographic application. When you need to validate a file has not been modified. You may use MD5 for this if you calculate the MD5 signature for the file, then compare it to the MD5 signature of any file you expect to find on the user's PC. If it matches, then the file has not been modified. You may use MD5 for this if you need to generate a unique identifier for a file (think file name, file path, email address, etc.) and you need to avoid the collision problem where two files have the same MD5. You may use MD5 in certificate/public key validation if you want to guarantee that the certificate is really from the correct entity (you need to have a list of entity names that you can compare the certificate signature to. You may use MD5 if you need to verify the integrity of a file that you will download from the Internet, and you do not want to download a file twice with different MD5 signatures and use the last one for validating its integrity. MD5 is not good for encrypting an

large amount of data, as MD5 is really fast. Where is MD5/RMD5 vulnerable? (I can think of a few instances)

MD5 is vulnerable to the various forms of semantic attacks, like rainbow table attacks. This is because MD5 is very fast and it hashes to a very small number of output values, and therefore, attackers are able to create a table of already hash values and their corresponding hashes, which is called an "MD5 rainbow table". A: MD5 is still the most popular tool used to validate hashes and it can be used in certain situations where speed is an issue. MD5 checks for collisions and is therefore better for detecting changes to files than using an "is this the 648931e174
