Musculoskeletal (MSK) disorders are one of the most common reasons for visits to the emergency department. Prehospital emergency care providers (PECPs) are frequently called to triage MSK trauma patients. It is well known that the ability to provide PECPs for emergency conditions is increasingly limited by a shortage of emergency medical technicians and physicians and increasing workloads. In an effort to reduce patients' MSK trauma triage times, an internal PECP quality improvement project was implemented. This was a 12-month prospective evaluation of the outcome of implementation of an MSK triage protocol. In addition, the study sought to identify and quantify perceived barriers to implementation of the MSK triage protocol. The PECP knowledge base was tested to assess provider self-perceived ability to screen patients for MSK injury. A questionnaire was administered to all PECPs to determine whether there were barriers to implementing the MSK triage protocol. Although the knowledge base demonstrated that PECPs were able to identify potential MSK injuries, the questionnaire demonstrated that only a small number of PECPs are routinely screening MSK trauma patients. There were also perceived barriers to implementation of the MSK triage protocol. Our study demonstrated that PECPs have suboptimal knowledge of MSK disorders. Also, despite the implementation of an MSK triage protocol, there are still perceived barriers to its implementation and PECPs still have an inability to reliably identify patients who require more intensive evaluation.Voyager 1 to send scientific data from Uranus Jupiter and Saturn are gone and now the solar system is in the Voyager 1 back.
